Historic Pahaska

Pahaska Teepee's original lodge was built by Colonel William F. "Buffalo Bill" Cody at the turn of the century. Buffalo Bill frequented the area on hunting trips in the 1880's. Twenty odd years later he returned and led the development of Yellowstone's East Entrance and Cody, Wyoming. In a far reaching deal with the Burlington Railroad and the federal government, he agreed to build two tourist hotels, the Irma in Cody and Pahaska at the east entrance to Yellowstone, both now on the National Historic Register.

The architect of Pahaska Teepee Lodge was A.A. Anderson, also thought of as the father of the Forest Service. The building's two story hewn log construction is a study for architects and builders alike. All materials were requisitioned from the building site, which lies in the middle of the Shoshone National Forest on a special use permit. Hardware and glass were hauled from the Cody railhead by wagon on the newly constructed North Fork road which was built by volunteers in the Cody Auto Club and Wapiti Valley developers.

"These mountains are so close to heaven, if you listen closely, you can hear the rustle of angel wings in the tree-tops."

Buffalo Bill Cody

Buffalo Bill believed that once word got about the incredible mountain scenery and abundant wildlife of the spectacular Wapiti Valley, the Cody road would soon become the most popular entrance to Yellowstone. In 1917, motorized vehicles were admitted to Yellowstone and Pahaska grew into a mountain village welcoming Park visitors as it still does today. By 1923, the East Entrance's scenery and close proximity to roads to the East made it the busiest entrance to the Park.

Today the Old Lodge still stands in all of its glory. Walking in the front door of the lodge is like walking into another era. Every facet of the original building is preserved in every detail. The deep golden brown logs and the historic architecture of the two story structure come together for an experience right out of the heart of the old west. You can almost hear the stories and lore that have been spun in the building over the years.
